46th Annual Battlefield Tour: Chickamauga and Chattanooga, May 1-5, 1996

by Robert I. Girardi

This Spring the Civil War Round Table's 46th annual battlefield tour will take us to Chickamauga, "The River of Death," and to Chattanooga, "The Gateway to the South." The tour will take us on a roundabout journey as we follow William S. Rosecrans's Army of the Cumberland as it pushed Braxton Bragg's Confederate Army of Tennessee out of the Volunteer State and into the rugged terrain of north Georgia, to the scene of the fighting at Chickamauga and the rout of the bluecoats back to Chattanooga. We will then tour the significant sites dealing with the lifting of the siege and the battles for Chattanooga.

Campaign headquarters will be the Holiday Inn Southeast on the slopes of Missionary Ridge where U.S. 41 meets with I-75. This central location will minimize the amount of time spent commuting and is also part of the "hallowed ground" we all know and love so well. Please plan to arrive the evening of May 1 to register and receive your tour packet. One shuttle bus will be provided at Nashville airport to bring you to Chattanooga on Wednesday evening. If you plan to use the shuttle, please make arrangements accordingly.

For those participating in the optional pre-tour of the Tullahoma Campaign, please meet at the Days Inn #1, International Plaza (on Briley Parkway) in Nashville at 8:30 a.m. on Wednesday, May 1.

Cost of the optional tour is $40.00 covering transportation and lunch. A bus will return you to Nashville airport on Sunday afternoon.

Transportation will be provided by Choo Choo Express Tours, on air conditioned buses specially designed to handle the steep slopes of Missionary Ridge, Sand Mountain, and Lookout Mountain. Our chief guide will be the esteemed Edwin C. Bearss, who has led our tours for over thirty years. He will be backed up by Jim Ogden, the chief historian at Chickamauga/Chattanooga National Military Park and Keith S. Bohannon, a National Park Service Employee who has devoted intensive study to these campaigns after several years serving under Robert K. Krick in Virginia.

the disastrous twin defeats at Gettysburg and Vicksburg, the Confederates were pushed out of middle Tennessee by a masterful campaign of maneuver by William S. Rosecrans. The Tullahoma Campaign, though virtually bloodless, seemingly dealt the Confederacy a crippling blow as they abandoned Chattanooga to the federals. The way to the deep South lay open.

Attempting to capitalize on his success, Rosecrans divided his army into three wings which simultaneously advanced in an attempt to cut off and destroy what he believed to be a demoralized and shattered enemy. But at Lafayette, the wily Braxton Bragg, being heavily reinforced, had other ideas and planned to strike the Union army in detail, as it advanced southward, divided by the mountains and rivers, before it could re-unite. The Union army was in peril, as it lay scattered across a sixty mile front. When Rosecrans learned of the danger, he immediately ordered the disparate elements of his army to reunite, but Bragg was already poised to strike the Union center, the 21st Corps under command of Major General Thomas L. Crittenden, which was at Lee and Gordon's Mill on Chickamauga Creek.

Battle of Chickamauga

On September 18th, sharp skirmishing broke out between Union pickets and advance elements of the Confederate army. By morning of the 19th, the Confederates lay in force on the west bank of Chickamauga Creek. Bragg hoped to destroy Crittenden's Corps by seizing the roads to Chattanooga and driving them back into McClemore's Cove before the other two Union army corps could come up.

Rosecrans, however, was alert to the danger and had reacted; by a series of forced marches, the corps of

George H. Thomas and Alexander McCook were able to join Crittenden. When firing broke out between troopers of Nathan Bedford Forrest's cavalry and the brigade of Colonel John Croxton, the battle of Chickamauga began in earnest. Fighting on the 19th was severe, but inconclusive.

Longstreet

During the night of the 19th, James P. Longstreet's Corps from Virginia detrained and joined Bragg's Army, which was poised to strike out against the Union left flank. Bragg hastily divided his army into two wings, commanded respectively by Leonidas Polk and James Longstreet. Delays and incompetence thwarted Bragg's plan for an early assault; but when the fighting began, it was fierce. At a critical juncture in the battle, Rosecrans mistakenly ordered the division of Thomas Wood to pull out of line, creating a gap through which Longstreet's Corps charged, effectively cutting the Union Army in half. Only the stubborn resistance of Thomas's men on the slopes of Snodgrass Hill and Horseshoe Ridge, and the timely arrival of reinforcements under Gordon Granger prevented the Union Army from being destroyed. Nevertheless, Rosecrans and half of his army were routed back into Chattanooga. Bragg rapidly followed and laid siege to the city from the hills and mountains that ringed the city.

CHATTANOOGA CAMPAIGN

The Union forces in Chattanooga were demoralized as a result of their defeat and Bragg's siege seriously threatened to starve them into retreat or submission. To alleviate the crisis, Ulysses S. Grant was sent to Chattanooga and empowered to relieve Rosecrans; this was promptly done. Grant then set about lifting the siege and restoring supplies to the Union forces. William T. Sherman and the Army of the Tennessee were also ordered to Chattanooga, as was Joseph Hooker, in command of the 11th and 12th Corps. Grant was determined to lift the siege and hold onto Chattanooga.

Battles for Chattanooga Brown's Ferry: When

Ulysses S. Grant took command of the Union forces in Chattanooga on October 23rd, he promptly began seeking a way to open a supply route to raise the siege on the beleaguered city. Adopting a plan that was already well-conceived, Union troops from William B. Hazen's brigade of Wood's Division floated down the Tennessee River in pontoon boats in a night attack on October 27. The amphibious assault was launched against Brown's Ferry, where Confederate pickets were taken by surprise. This effort allowed passage on the Tennessee for steamboats and effectively opened "the cracker line."

Wauhatchie: On October 28, Hooker's forces marched into Lookout Valley and Geary's Division stopped at Wauhatchie, about four miles below the northern point of Lookout Mountain. On the night of the 28th, Micah Jenkins's Division of Longstreet's Corps launched an attack in an effort to dislodge the federals. A confused firefight ensued, during which the Confederates were driven back, leaving the Union forces in control of Lookout Valley and solidifying their hold on the newly-opened supply route.

Orchard Knob: On November 23, acting on a report that some of the Confederate forces were withdrawing, Grant ordered Thomas to assault Orchard Knob, a small promontory that marked the Confederate outpost in front of Missionary Ridge. Thomas attacked and took the hill while Sherman advanced to the slopes of Tunnel Hill and Missionary Ridge.

Lookout Mountain: On November 24th, Joe Hooker was ordered to make a demonstration against the slopes of Lookout Mountain. Reinforced by Osterhaus's Division, Hooker's men advanced and were met by sharp volleys from the Confederate defenders. Hooker's men drove the Confederates up the slopes of the mountain and taking advantage of the terrain, were able to advance to the summit. The battle took place in a thick fog which shrouded the attackers from Confederate artillery fire and left the outcome of the battle in doubt until the following morning, when the Stars and Stripes were observed flying from the summit.

Tunnel Hill and Missionary Ridge: Grant planned to dislodge Bragg's hold on Chattanooga once and for all. On November 25, Sherman and the Army of the Tennessee were to make a grand assault designed to drive the Confederates from the hills and open the way south. Thomas's Army of the Cumberland was relegated to a supporting role, expected merely to make a demonstration against the rifle pits at the base of the ridge. Sherman's attack bogged down due in part to faulty reconnaissance and the stubborn resistance offered by Pat Cleburne's Division. Sherman, in fact, attacked the wrong position. Impatient at Sherman's lack of progress, Grant ordered Thomas to make a demonstration. The Army of the Cumberland went forward and seized the first line of defenses at the base of Missionary Ridge. Their new position was vulnerable to enemy fire however, and the only choice left them was to advance or retreat. Acting without orders, each unit began to advance, driving the enemy before them up the slopes of Missionary Ridge. Watching in disbelief at the unexpected assault from his position on Orchard Knob, Grant witnessed perhaps the grandest spectacle of the warthe improbable success of a frontal assault against fortified heights. Bragg's army was routed in what was a true disaster for the Confederacy.

Ringgold Gap: Following the unprecedented disaster, the Confederate army fought a desperate rearguard action, trying to stave off the pursuing federals. At Ringgold Gap, Cleburne's Division bloodily repulsed the pursuers, buying time for the Army of Tennessee to retreat into Georgia. The action here on November 27 closed the Chattanooga Campaign.
