Herman Hattaway on “Teaching the Civil War at West Point”

by Barbara Hughett

The United States Military Academy at West Point, New York, was established in 1802 by an Act of Congress. Men who studied at the Academy, of course, played crucial roles in the American Civil War. Of the 1249 known living graduates when the war commenced, eighty-nine percent served in either the Union or Confederate armies. A modern-day cadet can be inspired by the impressive array of Civil War memorials which adorn the grounds and halls of West Point.

How is Civil War history taught today at the Academy? Herman Hattaway, who taught the course on “The Military History of the Civil War” as a visiting professor at West Point during the 1990-1991 academic year, will address that question when he speaks to The Civil War Round Table on March 13. His topic is “Teaching the Civil War at West Point.”

Hattaway was born in New Orleans and received his B.A., M.A., and Ph.D. degrees from Louisiana State University. His doctoral work was done under the direction of noted historian T. Harry Williams, recipient of The Round Table’s 1976 Nevins-Freeman Award. Currently professor of history at the University of Missouri-Kansas City, Hattaway has been on the faculty there since 1969. His first book, General Stephen D. Lee, won the 1976 Jefferson Davis Award. He is the co-author of How the North Won (1983) and How the South Lost (1986), and was a major contributor to the Historical Times Encyclopedia of the Civil War, as well as to both of William C. Davis’s multi-volume photographic histories. He is currently editing, with Albert Castel, a new edition of Confederate guerrilla John McCorkle’s memoir, Three Years with Quantrill.

Herman Hattaway spoke to The Round Table on two previous occasions: in March 1979 on “Stephen D. Lee” and in February 1985 on “How the North Won.” Emulating his major professor Williams, who was Harmsworth Professor at Oxford University in England and subsequently had a Round Table circuit speech entitled “Teaching the Civil War at Oxford,” Hattaway was inspired to prepare his “West Point” address.
Filmmaker Steven Spielberg's production company is shooting a two-hour pilot movie with a Civil War theme for ABC television. Titled "The Class of '61," the film dramatizes the impact of the war on two West Point roommates and their families—one from the North, one from the South—in the spring and summer of 1861.

BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION

UPDATE

by David Richert

Despite finding that the Civil War sites in the Shenandoah Valley are "its most important, most neglected, and most threatened resource," a year-long congressional study has recommended against establishing a new national park there. In making its recommendation, the study said that creating a new national park would be "complex, controversial, and expensive."

The $100,000 study was commissioned by Congress in 1990 in response to heightened interest in preserving the Valley's rich Civil War heritage. Currently, there is only spotty protection of the fifteen battlefields studied. The report asserts that to properly interpret the great Valley campaigns—Stonewall Jackson in 1862 and Early and Sheridan in 1864—would require preservation of most of the fifteen battlefields. That could total 30,000 acres at staggering cost, the report suggests.

In announcing the report, Marilyn Nickels, chief of Interior Secretary Manuel Lujan's American Battlefield Protection Program, said, "We have a real concern not to place the National Park Service in a position of assuming responsibility for areas for which we have neither the dollars nor the authorization to start a new park. We felt it was real important to be quite honest about the challenges the federal government would face. Nobody wants to set up for failure."

The report details the threats to the battlefields: residential and commercial growth, the loss of a quarter of a million acres of farmland in the last thirty years, and construction of Interstate 81 in the 1960s that degraded the integrity of ten of the fifteen battlefields. The study addresses several options that the federal government can take besides a full-fledged national park, such as federal preservation of one or two major battlefields, assistance to other groups in running a park system, encouraging preservation measures like zoning and easements, and confining federal action to interpreting the battlefields.

A. Wilson Greene, executive director of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS), laments the failure of the report to recommend a national park. "In public access and interpretation, no one does a better job than the National Park Service." He also asserts that the report is mistaken in its conclusion that the government would have to acquire thousands of acres. He advocates acquiring a small "core" of land at each battlefield, augmented by easements or restrictive zoning to preserve additional land. He cites as an example the 195 acres that the APCWS has just purchased at Fisher's Hill, which covers the key area of the battlefield and is sufficient for interpretation (see below).

The Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) closed December 31, 1991 on 195 acres at the foot of Fisher's Hill battlefield in the Shenandoah Valley. The purchase preserves a key area of the September 22, 1864 battle, in which Union General Philip Sheridan's troops routed Confederates under Jubal Early. The half mile of the four-mile battle line that the APCWS owns is where the Confederate line crumbled.

The property will continue to be farmed, but the APCWS is planning for public access and interpretation. A dedication ceremony will be held April 4.
FEBRUARY MEETING

by Barbara Hughett

An early American humorist once observed, "It's not what folks don't know that hurts them, it's what they know that ain't so." This is especially true in the study of American Civil War history; many events of that period have yet to be critically examined. Early accounts, though sometimes self-serving and inaccurate, remain the standard for us today. One example of this centers on a critical event during the Battle of Chickamauga. On February 14, historian William Glenn Robertson spoke before 98 members and guests at the 50th regular meeting of The Civil War Round Table. His topic was "General Thomas J. Wood at Chickamauga: The Fatal Order Revisited."

The battle lines at Chickamauga were fairly stabilized by the morning of September 20, 1863, following initial fighting on the 18th and heavy and confused fighting on the 19th. Late that morning, Union General George Thomas sent a courier, Captain Sanford Kellogg, to General William Rosecrans to ask for reinforcements.

According to the traditional story, en route to Rosecrans, Kellogg missed seeing an entire division of several thousand men and reported a gap in the Union line to the commanding general. Without consulting his meticulous chief of staff, James A. Garfield, who was "unavailable" at the time, Rosecrans asked his aide, Major Frank S. Bond, to write an order to General Thomas J. Wood. It read: "The general commanding directs that you close up on Reynolds as fast as possible and support him."

Wood, still smarting from an earlier reprimand from Rosecrans for not moving fast enough, immediately moved his division out of the line—in spite of strong indications that Confederates were opposite him in very great strength. Almost instantly, three of Confederate General James Longstreet's divisions crashed through the gap and drove three Northern divisions away from the field, making possible a Southern victory at Chickamauga.

Blame for the disaster has traditionally been cast on four individuals: Rosecrans, Kellogg, Bond, and Wood. Robertson offered an alternative hypothesis, based on his extensive research over the last ten years, to "redeem some of these villains."

He contends that Kellogg was sent first to General John M. Brannon, not Rosecrans. "Seeing the problem, the two men went and checked with General John F. Reynolds... then Kellogg went to Rosecrans, telling him there would be a gap in the line." Garfield was present when Bond wrote what became known as "the fatal order," and even explained it to the courier. The explanation that Garfield was "unavailable" was contrived during the former general's 1880 presidential campaign, to prevent his opponents from suggesting any possible stain on the Republican candidate's war record.

The reported earlier reprimand of Wood by Rosecrans, according to Robertson, never occurred, and its genesis can be traced to erroneous dialogue in an 1889 book written by Henry Cist, a junior officer at the time of the incident, who was repeating "army gossip." Upon receiving "the fatal order," Robertson claimed, Wood was apprehensive, realizing how near the enemy might be, and sought the counsel of General Alexander McCook. McCook advised him that "the only thing for him to do was obey the order," and that he could face a court martial if he did otherwise. McCook said, "Move out. I will backfill the position." Before that could happen, of course, Longstreet "filled the position." In Robertson's opinion, the Union loss at Chickamauga was the responsibility of Rosecrans and Chief of Staff Garfield.

In concluding his address, Robertson emphasized that "complex events like battles are seldom as simple as they are presented in books. It's easy to impugn the motives of commanders without checking deeply. It's easy to characterize commanders as buffoons or knaves and not really try to understand them. I believe this story proves that we need to probe a little more deeply... to get at the truth and thereby achieve a better understanding of what went on. We need to do it with humanity and not merely look for villains and heroes; we need to see them as complex individuals acting under stress. Sometimes they made the wrong decisions. Their motives may not have been wrong, and they may have believed they were acting correctly. I believe many Civil War events need reevaluating. We have gone on too long relying on some self-serving memoirs of senior commanders... There's much to do and it's time to begin."

The Eleventh Annual Midwest Civil War Round Table Conference will be held on April 24-26, in Fort Wayne, Indiana. Among the featured speakers will be Herman Hattaway, Mark E. Neely Jr., and Jerry Russell. For information, contact Marshall Brinkman at (219) 745-5517.

The Fourth Annual Mid-Atlantic Regional Conference of Civil War Round Tables will be held on April 25 in Philadelphia. Speakers will include Benjamin F. Cooling, Peter Cozzens, and Wiley Sword. For information, contact Mike Cavanaugh at (215) 636-1666.

Lincoln and the Common Law has recently been completed by Dan W. Bannister. The paperback book, which sells for $12.95, is a by-product of Bannister's extensive volunteer service in drafting briefs of more than 300 Lincoln-related Illinois Supreme Court cases for the Lincoln Legals Project. For information, write Human Services Press, Box 2423, Springfield, Illinois 62705.

The Houston Civil War Round Table has announced that its 1992 Frank L. Vandiver Award of Merit will go to Robert W. Meinhard, professor emeritus at Winona State University in Minnesota, and battlefield preservation chairman of Civil War Round Table Associates. The award will be presented on May 21. Vandiver was the recipient of The Civil War Round Table's 1962 Nevins-Freeman Award.

The National Park Service is planning to build a prisoner-of-war museum, containing artifacts and information from all American wars, near Camp Sumter at the Andersonville Prison site in southern Georgia. The Friends of Andersonville will raise $2.5 million needed for the 10,000-square-foot museum, and the federal government will provide $4 million for park improvements and a new entrance.

The nation's first veterans' hospital, in Togus, Maine, has been in continuous operation since 1866. It was recently dedicated with the opening of a new wing and a Civil War weekend encampment attended by over 200 reenactors.

Two new Civil War videos featuring the Battle of Cedar Creek have been made in the past year. The first, produced by Video Vision of Hagerstown, Maryland, is entitled "The Battle of Cedar Creek." It was taped on location at the battlefield and Belle Grove Mansion, and features military historian and Cedar Creek expert Joseph W. A. Whitehorn. The 47-minute video includes footage from the 1990 reenactment, animated maps, dramatic vignettes, and period photographs and drawings. To order, send $24.95 in check or money order to: Video Vision, 37 E. Washington St., Hagerstown, Maryland 21740. For VISA or Mastercard orders call (301) 791-3496. Please specify VHS or Beta.

The second video, produced by Lou Reda Productions, Inc. of Easton, Pennsylvania, is entitled "Bloody Shenandoah." The one hour video is narrated by Burgess Meredith and covers the entire Shenandoah Valley campaign of 1864. Lou Reda Productions made use of film footage of thousands of reenactors to recreate the dramatic battles that raged throughout the Valley in 1864. For information on obtaining a copy of "Bloody Shenandoah" contact: Lou Reda Productions, Inc., Box 68, 44 North Second Street, Easton, PA 18042, (215) 258-2957.
