John Y. Simon on “Forging a Commander: Ulysses S. Grant and the First Year of the Civil War”

by Barbara Hughett

A man who might have been voted as “least likely to succeed” in 1861, Ulysses S. Grant emerged as the great military leader of the Union. Grant was nearly thirty-nine years old when the Civil War began. His military and civilian careers had been drab and unsuccessful. By the time he turned forty, he had the battles of Belmont, Fort Donelson, and Shiloh behind him.

At Appomattox in 1865, Grant received the surrender of a general fifteen years his senior. Yet if relative youth offered advantages, what happened to George B. McClellan, Grant’s junior in age? By seeking to balance issues of age, experience, and personality, John Y. Simon will attempt to explore Grant’s rapid rise in a single year from small-town leather store clerk to major general. The topic of Simon’s address on June 9 is “Forging a Commander: Ulysses S. Grant and the First Year of the Civil War.”

What role, if any, did luck play in Grant’s remarkable change of fortune? After the first year of war, Grant went on to greater military responsibility, including larger armies and higher rank, but his accomplishments in the first year presaged his future—his weaknesses as well as his strengths.

A native of Highland Park, Illinois, John Y. Simon earned his bachelor’s degree at Swarthmore College, and his masters and doctoral degrees at Harvard University. In the summers during his undergraduate years, he worked as a stockboy in the book shop of Round Table Founder Ralph G. Newman. Simon claims that he learned more working for Mr. Newman than he did in all his years of graduate school.

John Simon taught at Ohio State University, began editing The Papers of Ulysses S. Grant in 1962, and in 1964 moved to Southern Illinois University at Carbondale, where he is professor of history as well as editor of the Grant Papers and executive director of the Ulysses S. Grant Association. The first volume of the Papers appeared in 1967, and nineteen more have been published since then. Simon’s Grant project is noted both for its prodigious output and for its qualities. He is the dean of documentary editors, a founder of the Association for Documentary Editing, and a spokesperson for the craft before groups ranging from committees of the United States Congress to interested students.

BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION

* UPDATE *

by David Richert

Each year the American Battlefield Protection Program awards partnership monies to local and state battlefield preservation organizations to be used for battlefield preservation, interpretation, planning, community consensus building, and staff support. Funding totalled $450,275 in 1995. Following is a partial list of 1995 partnership award recipients.

• Alcorn County Board of Supervisors for an archaeological survey of the Corinth Contraband Camp. Contraband camps, comprised of freed and fugitive slaves, appeared behind northern lines as the Union army advanced south. The Corinth camp was one of the longest running and best organized. This award will support a search for the camp to identify its exact location and to evaluate the importance of any remaining subsurface resources.

• Kennesaw Mountain National Battlefield, Brushy Mountain Line District Conservation Plan. The area from Brushy Mountain to Lost Mountain was a twelve-mile-long outer defense line of sophisticated trench works, forts, and batteries. This project will support a study of the surviving fortification system.

• Lord Fairfax Planning District Commission, Shenandoah Valley Battlefield Heritage Plan. The Commission will develop and implement regional strategies to preserve critical battlefield lands and to provide technical assistance to Shenandoah County for Cedar Creek, Fisher’s Hill, Toms Brook, and New Market.

• Missouri Department of Natural Resources, Pilot Knob Battlefield Protection Plan. The objective of this project is to formulate a strategy to protect tracts of land,
such as Shepherd Mountain, that were part of the battlefield as well as other surviving landmarks.

• The Trust for Public Land, Inc., The Atlanta Campaign
Land Protection Initiative. The Trust will provide planing and training in negotiating conservation easements within the Atlanta Campaign Corridor. Under a conservation easement, landowners continue to own and manage the use of the property, but may agree to restrict development. The project will focus on the site of the Battle of Resaca.

• Virginia Department of Historic Resources, Civil War Sites Advisory Commission Survey. The VDHR will expand and build on a program for completing a survey of Civil War battlefields in Virginia. The final data will be distributed to appropriate local governments. The VDHR will also produce a Guidebook to Virginia’s Civil War Battlefields.

• Frederick County, Resource Management Plan and Site Preparation for the Kernstown Battlefield. A detailed plan will be prepared for the management of the Grim Farm and Sand Ridge portions of the Kernstown Battlefield. Appropriate provisions for public access, trails, signs, and other interpretive features will be considered.

• Mississippi Department of Archives and History, Port Gibson Preservation Plan. A battlefield preservation plan for Port Gibson will be developed. It will identify significant Civil War sites, assess current and potential threats, and develop preservation strategies.
MAY MEETING

by Larry Gibbs

On May 12, at the 541st regular meeting of The Civil War Round Table, Tamara (Tam) Moser (Melia) Smith gave a spirited presentation on “James B. McPherson and the Ideals of the Old Army” to 93 members and guests. Smith, who is writing a biography of McPherson, made a number of interesting observations about his life. She noted that, in general, McPherson is better known for his death at the age of 35 than for his life. Known to most historians as the highest-ranking Union officer killed in battle, McPherson perhaps represented the best of the Old Army ideals. General Ulysses Grant was inconsolable when told of McPherson’s death on July 22, 1864, at the Battle of Atlanta, calling him “one of the ablest and most competent generals in the Union Army.”

McPherson was the most popular cadet at West Point, and ranked first in his class. After graduating, he took a teaching position. This was followed by the chief engineering assignment for the construction of Alcatraz in San Francisco harbor. In 1862, General Henry Halleck sent McPherson as an aide to Grant at the battles of Forts Henry and Donelson. In the Vicksburg campaign in 1863, McPherson was the only commander under Grant who succeeded in constructing canals. “Both Halleck and Grant held McPherson in very high regard,” explained Smith.

As a foremost advocate of Old Army ideals, McPherson subordinated independent thought to the orders of superiors. He was a follower, not a leader. His faithful obedience to orders became both his greatest strength and biggest weakness. A turning point came at the Battle of Resaca. McPherson was ordered to take the position unless his command received stiff opposition. If resistance came, he was to retreat. At the battle, General Sherman’s cavalry did not arrive to aid McPherson, so he retreated five miles to Snake Creek Gap. Although he had superior numbers, McPherson did as he was ordered — he retreated. This retreat brought McPherson severe criticism. Smith said “he was accused of being too timid, too then nervous.” In effect, he carried out his orders too well. McPherson wanted to deflect these criticisms; he would have given a chance to vindicate himself around Atlanta.

In the early summer of 1864, Confederate President Jefferson Davis replaced General Joseph Johnston with the aggressive General John Bell Hood. McPherson, a former roommate of Hood’s at West Point, correctly predicted that Hood would attack Union forces at Atlanta before eventually leaving the city. McPherson, stinging from criticism of his retreat at Resaca, did not desire a repeat performance. During the second Rebel attack on July 22, he was mortally wounded. McPherson felt he could not suffer any more indignities and perhaps he took an unnecessary risk to prove his courage.

McPherson’s troops later reacted with fury and revenge against the Confederates in Georgia and South Carolina. On November 30, 1864, they captured Ft. McAllister, and other battles were won by his former troopers with tremendous ferocity. These actions were an attempt to honor their fallen leader. After the war, McPherson’s soldiers thought so much of him that his officers started a Society of the Army of the Tennessee. “This organization honored McPherson as an irreplaceable officer, martyr for the ideals of the Old Army,” asserted Smith.

The army trained McPherson well, but he had a major flaw. He obeyed orders, but no more. Although his leadership was unquestioned and he never lost a battle, he was overly cautious. “His subordination to orders never gave him a chance to exhibit any boldness or originality as a military leader,” Smith concluded. “McPherson had the potential to be great, but his premature death abruptly ended that promise.”

His many awards include the Distinguished Service Award of the Association for Documentary Editing (1983) and the 1986 Nevens-Freeman Award of The Civil War Round Table of Chicago. He is a very popular speaker on the lecture circuit, and is currently at work on volumes 21 and 22 of the Grant Papers.

Simon has appeared before The Round Table on a number of occasions over the years. He last spoke to us at our Fiftieth Anniversary Celebration in October 1990, when his topic was “Fifty Years of The Civil War Round Table.” He last addressed a regular meeting exactly six years ago — on June 9, 1989 — when he spoke on “Edward D. Baker, Ball’s Bluff, and the Politics of Command.”

Illinois Monument at Vicksburg

As reported in the February newsletter, the Illinois Memorial Temple at Vicksburg is undergoing restoration, and additional monies are required. Our friend Terry Wilschel, National Park Service historian at Vicksburg, has asked for help from Round Tables and individuals in Illinois in order to finish the project. His request is part of a larger program being implemented at Vicksburg — one in which the private sector of various states is being asked to contribute to the restoration of monuments commemorating their own. We who delight in annual battlefield tours — like the recent trip to Vicksburg — might consider our debt to those who fought there and remember them by returning their gift. Personal donations to the project may be sent to Supt. William Nichols, Vicksburg National Military Park, 3201 Clay St., Vicksburg, Mississippi 38690; please make your check payable to “National Park Service,” with “Illinois Monument at Vicksburg” noted on the memo line. For additional information, contact Mary Abroe, at 708-251-4745.

As decided at the 1995 Summer Executive Committee Meeting, the destination of the 1996 Annual Battlefield Tour of The Civil War Round Table will be Chickamauga and Chattanooga. Tour chair will be Robert Girardi. His co-chair is Past President Kurt Carlson. Mark your calendars for May 1-5.
