Keith Rocco on “Civil War Art: ‘On Campaign’”

by Barbara Hughett

THE exceptional quality of Keith Rocco’s work lies in his talent to capture history in its own time frame—as if the window next to his easel looked out on another century. His work has been compared to the masters of historical art: deNeuville, Détaille, Messionier, and Pyle. These artists, Rocco says, were his most important teachers.

“What I found being taught in art school didn’t help nearly as much as what I found in the works of these artists,” Rocco says. “They not only depicted life, they infused it with an intensity of feeling. All of those artists, whether they were painting a soldier considering the rations in his haversack or the rage of battle—did it in such a way as to make you feel you are right there. Looking at their paintings, you can smell the sulphurous smoke from the gun and feel the sun fall across your back. They go beyond a simple rendition of a scene, and I set that as my standard. My goal is to portray history, not only with accuracy, but to somehow go beyond that and make it possible for the viewer to experience the sensation of being in the scene itself.”

The topic of Keith Rocco’s presentation to the Round Table on April 17 is “Civil War Art: ‘On Campaign.’” The program will include a slide presentation of his paintings along with firsthand accounts by the veterans who provided the artistic stimulation for the work. The lecture is based on Rocco’s book, On Campaign, a compilation of his work. It follows the rank and file’s experience, both North and South, from camp to campaign through battle to its inevitable aftermath. This show is a visual story of the experiences of soldiering during the American Civil War.

Keith Rocco was a member of this Round Table for a number of years before moving to Virginia; his Traditions studios are located in Woodstock, Virginia. His passion for history has its roots in his childhood. When he was nine years old, his parents gave him a book on the Civil War. The book was filled with photographs and paintings from the period, and Rocco—already a budding artist—spent hours copying from it. His Civil War interest further developed three years later when he bought his first artifact: a cavalry saber, purchased on a class trip to Gettysburg.

After he graduated from high school and was looking around for art schools, he faced a dilemma. “In the 1960s and 70s,” he recalled, “the word at most art schools was anti-realism. Obviously, being a realist, I found that unsettling.” After two attempts at art schools, Rocco realized that if he was truly interested in realism, he was going to have to teach himself and began to hone his craft

BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION ☆ UPDATE ☆

by Mary Munsell Abroe

Shenandoah Valley Commission Receives Funding and Chooses Chairman: As reported in last month's column, the Shenandoah Valley Battlefields Historic District Commission recently began its congressionally mandated task of formulating a management/preservation plan for ten of the Valley's battle sites. Under its authorizing legislation, the commission is entitled to a maximum of $250,000 in federal funding to complete its work; in fact, it will receive that amount from the FY 1998 Interior Department appropriations for the National Park Service's Heritage Partnership Grants Program. Unfortunately, Congress did not see fit to provide the commission with funding of its own, thus requiring the use of monies from Interior's regular appropriations that could be used elsewhere to meet the many demands on an overtaxed budget that is never adequate. Interior also will provide technical aid in the planning process and in the evaluation and interpretation of historical resources.

Another significant and positive development of late is the election of Carrington Williams as the commission's chairman. Williams, a lawyer practicing in northern Virginia and a former member of the Virginia General assembly, is a trustee of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites as well as its general counsel. In an interview with Civil War News, he noted that a matter of urgency at present is the employment of a full-time executive director. (Part-time staff assistance will be provided by the National Park Service's Sandy Rives, who for the next year-and-a-half will combine work for the Shenandoah Valley commission with his new job as superintendent of Fredericksburg/Spotsylvania.) Williams also indicated that a major challenge for the commission, which has about three years in which to finish its work, is prioritization of tasks: the commission's legislative mandate is quite extensive, involving not only Civil War battlefields but also natural and cultural resources.

Funds Allocated for Restoration of Four Structures at Antietam: With the expediency typical of federal bureaucracy, $3.6 million has been allotted to Antietam National Battlefield for work on four significant buildings sixteen years after the initial application for funding. Happily, the monies will be devoted to restoring the Mumma house and barn (as well as some outbuildings) in the battlefield's core, in addition to the Sherrick and Otto houses near Burnside's Bridge in the southern sector.

The homestead of Samuel Mumma, torched by D.H. Hill's troops on the morning of the battle so that it could not serve as a haven for sharpshooters, was rebuilt quickly; the barn experienced a similar fate. Work on the Mumma property will use about $1.5 million of the designated monies; the house will be stabilized and put to adaptive use as the park's administrative offices and archives/library, while the barn will be restored to its 1862 appearance and, as a "building within a building," it will shelter Antietam's natural and cultural resources personnel.

On March 13, at the 569th regular meeting of The Civil War Round Table, Mark Bradley gave an informative address on "The Battle of Bentonville" before 87 members and guests. Bradley, a tour guide for this Round Table's annual battlefield tour (April 29-May 3), wrote about the Battle of Bentonville for Blue and Gray magazine. Author of the recently-published Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, Bradley is in the process of finishing a second book on North Carolina's role in the Civil War. He whetted the interests in this year's battlefield tour with an interesting display of slides, mixed with a superb narrative of this relatively-unknown battle.

In presenting the vital statistics about the Battle of Bentonville, Bradley stated, "This was the largest North Carolina battle during the Civil War. The Battle of Bentonville occurred on March 19-21, 1865. A grand total of 80,000 Union and Confederate troops fought in an area of 6,000 acres. The casualties included 2,606 Rebels and 1,527 Yankees. The battle was the culminating event in Union General William Tecumseh Sherman's 1865 campaign in the Carolinas." After his army marched through Georgia, Sherman saw the strategic importance of marching through the Carolinas. On January 2, 1865, General Ulysses S. Grant gave Sherman his wish.

The Union march through South Carolina began on February 1, 1865, with 60,000 Federals facing 20,000 Rebels. The Confederates, led by General P.G.T. Beauregard, tried to impede the oncoming Union troops. By February 17, Columbia, South Carolina, was captured, then burned the next day. Confederate General Joseph Johnston replaced Beauregard at this point. When crossing the border into North Carolina, Sherman's army headed north in two columns. The goal of these two Union wings was to eventually reunite in order to pursue Johnston's Army of the Tennessee. Bradley claimed, "Sherman's designation was to head to Goldsboro before moving north to link up with Grant at Petersburg."

Since many Rebels had fallen at the Battles of Franklin and Nashville in November, 1864, the Army of Tennessee had been weakened considerably. Therefore, Johnston did not have the manpower to attack the entire force of Sherman's army; he could only attack a wing of the Union army before the two columns reunited. Johnston saw his chance at Bentonville when he realized Sherman divided his army, leaving each wing vulnerable to attack.

On March 16, Union General Henry Slocum's corps became the wing that General Johnston targeted. The Federals skirmished the Rebels at Averasboro. Another skirmish occurred two days later between Slocum's troops charged again at a site two miles south of Bentonville. Due to poor reconstituting by the Federals, Sherman at first believed that only the Confederate cavalry was involved. "Finally, at 1:30 p.m., Sherman became a believer: the entire Rebel army was at his front," asserted Bradley. "Unfortunately for the Rebels, Confederate General Braxton Bragg thought he needed reinforcements; as a result, a Rebel division of 5,500 troops was not involved in the battle."

Johnston attacked again at 2:45 p.m. for the last grand assault. The Rebel attack succeeded at first, but lack of soldiers caused their downfall. For over two hours, the Confederate attack pushed forward as intense fighting occurred along a parapet of logs and mud. In one Confederate regiment, 270 soldiers were reduced to 115 in only five minutes as the Federals counterattacked across the Goldsboro road. The Confederates made seven desperate assaults into the Union infantry. None of these attacks punched a hold in the Union line.

At 9 p.m., Johnston called off any more attacks. The Confederate lines were protected by a giant horseshoe deployment as Johnston's army waited. Johnston was hopeful that the Federals would charge into a fateful mistake, but Union reinforcements arrived, unifying Sherman's two wings again.

On March 20, Union forces outflanked the Confederates left, forcing a Rebel retreat. On the evening of March 21, Johnston reluctantly ordered his courageous troops to withdraw. This action ended the Battle of Bentonville.

Bradley posed this question: "Why did Johnston remain at Bentonville on the morning of March 21?" He replied, "First, the wounded were taken to Smithfield. Secondly, Johnston thought that he might catch Sherman in a suicide attack. Finally, Johnston wanted to link up with Lee in Virginia, if possible." Bradley raised another question: Did Sherman follow the correct strategy by allowing Johnston's Army of Tennessee to escape? Bradley explained, "In his memoirs, Sherman admitted that he made a mistake by not trying to capture Johnston's army, because Grant's greatest fear was that Lee's 70,000 Confederates in Virginia would move south to link up with the Army of Tennessee. If that event occurred, the war would have probably have lasted several more months."

On April 26, 1865, Johnston's army surrendered to Sherman at the Bennett House near Durham, North Carolina. The long, painful conflict known as the Civil War had effectively ended.

The frame Otto house, built in the late eighteenth century, will be stabilized and the outside returned to its appearance on September 16, 1862. In an interview with Civil War News, Park Superintendent John Howard indicated that the Otto property will act as a "scene setter," with the planting of an orchard and additional vegetation, helping to reestablish the ambiance of a Civil War-era farm. Howard also noted that the 1830s-vintage Sherrick house, a stately brick residence across from the Otto site, needs interior and structural work that will not noticeably alter its current appearance. The entire restoration project moves toward the objectives of regaining the battlefield's look of 136 years ago.

Former President Marshall Krockick and Trustee Frank Patton, president of the Union League Club Civil War Round Table, will address the luncheon meeting of the Union League Club Civil War Round Table on Monday, April 27. They will continue their discussion of "Grant, from Chattanooga to the Wilderness." A reception begins at the Union League Club at 11:30 a.m.; luncheon is served at noon. The cost is $15 per person. For reservations, call 312-435-5000.

KEITH ROCCO (continued from page 1) on his own. Over the next six years, he did commercial art for an advertising agency by day and painted scenes out of history by night. Many of his early canvases were inspired by artifacts in his own collection.

Now, he not only does Civil war art but is also well known and respected for his works on the Napoleonic era.
“Spreading out into more than one area inspires perspective,” he says. “When I come back to the Civil War after, say, Waterloo, I am seeing the whole century rounded out. Every bit of information about every scenario I have ever researched gets used in every painting, whether it’s literal or not. Because what you are learning is always there, shaping your understanding of how and why things happened the way they did.”

“What I strive to do in military art,” Rocco says, “is to portray that moment that most communicates how the common soldier experienced himself. Sometimes the point of take-off is a reflective moment, and sometimes, of course, it’s a moment in battle. The point in either, however, is to make history something real, something that carries the viewer out of himself and into another world where it is his response, literally, that keeps history alive.”

The annual luncheon of the Stephen A. Douglas Association will be held on June 6 this year, instead of in April, as it has been the past few years. S.A.D.A. members will receive additional information later this month in The Little Giant, and this newsletter will give more details in next month’s issue.

We are saddened to announce the death of an old and dear friend and Honorary Life member of The Civil War Round Table of Chicago, Elden C. “Josh” Billings, on March 20 in Fredericksburg, Virginia. He was a longtime resident of Georgetown, and was very active in historical associations in our nation’s capital. A noted Civil War and Lincoln scholar, he was a popular lecturer around the nation. After retiring from his position as an economist for the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress in 1973, he devoted more time to his Civil War interests. In April 1977, he addressed The Chicago Round Table on “Sherman: A Critical Character Sketch.” He received many awards for his work, including the Bruce Catton Award of the District of Columbia Civil War
Round Table. Our deepest condolences go to his wife Margaret and all of his family.

We are sorry to report the death, on January 25, of Round Table member, Rev. Charles Brannon, S.J., at the Colombier Jesuit Community in Clarkston, Michigan. A retired theology professor at Loyola University Chicago, Father Brannon—known better to Round Table members as “Charlie”—had a distinguished academic career and was very active in the Civil Rights movement in the 1960s and cared very much about American Civil War history. A colleague of his said that “He just believed in looking for God, not only in prayer but in all the circumstances of your life.” Our deepest condolences go to his family.

The Civil War Round Table of New York presented its 1998 Barondess/Lincoln Award to the Lincoln Home National Historic Site in Springfield, Illinois. The Site, administered by the National Park Service, was honored for “its innovative interpretation of the life of Abraham Lincoln.” In accepting, Superintendent Norman Hellmers cited the efforts of his staff and acknowledged “the fine work done by their predecessors, especially the late George L. Painter.”
