On November of 1863, the Gettysburg Cemetery Commission invited President Abraham Lincoln to attend the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg, where the thousands of men killed in that battle were being reinterred. The invitation asked the president to make “a few appropriate remarks” after the main speaker of the day, former Secretary of State Edward Everett, finished his two hour oration.

President Lincoln delivered those “few appropriate remarks” that November 19th. The brief, 272 word speech, delivered in a few minutes, has become perhaps the best known, and most quoted, address by any president. Tying the cause of Union to the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln boldly invoked the vision of the Founding Fathers of a nation “conceived in Liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal” and pledged “a new birth of freedom”. Although hostile newspapers dismissed the speech as “silly”, most observers at the time praised it. Said the Providence (R.I.) Journal, “We know not where to look for a more admirable speech than the brief one which the President made”. The Chicago Tribune predicted “The dedicatory remarks by President Lincoln will live among the annals of man”. To this day, best-selling authors write 200,000 word books analyzing this simple, direct 272-word prose masterpiece.

On May 8th Kent Gramm will speak on “A More Perfect Tribute,” the subject being how Abraham Lincoln wrote the Gettysburg Address. Mr. Gramm will discuss some common misconceptions regarding the address, and attempt to place the address in its historical and philosophical context. Among the questions to be discussed will be: How much fact and how much fiction are in the well-known story of the President's composing the Gettysburg Address while on the train to Gettysburg? How might the Gettysburg Address be pertinent today?

Kent Gramm attended Carroll College, Princeton Theological Seminary, the University of Tuebingen (Germany), and the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee. He has taught American Studies, Literature, and Creative Writing at UW-Milwaukee, the University of Giessen (Germany), Indiana Wesleyan University, and Wheaton College. Kent is currently Program Director for the Seminary Ridge Historical Preservation Foundation in Gettysburg, and is the author of four books related to the Civil War: Gettysburg: A Meditation on War and Values; November: Lincoln’s Elegy at Gettysburg; Somebody’s Darling: Essays on the Civil War; and with photographer Chris Heisey, Gettysburg: This Hallowed Ground.
Ron Elkins sent his gratitude for our “gift of $500.00 to be used in the continued work of the Foundation.” He went on to relate that “since its establishment in 1950, the Foundation...has participated proudly in many improvement projects, assisting the National Park Service to secure the needed resources and develop the battlefield so that visitors can appreciate the events that occurred on a hot August day in 1861. Since its initial purchase of 37 acres on Bloody Hill, the Foundation has been actively involved in preserving the natural Ozarks setting that was the scene of this historic battle.”

Tom Clemens of SHAF offered thanks “for the very generous donation. Your gracious contribution of $500 is gratefully received...and will help immensely with our efforts.... Our latest project, the new worm fence along Branch Avenue, will replace the old cement post-and-wire fence, greatly enhancing the scenery and interpretation of the field. A great deal of work has been done on the south end of the field and the newly-acquired land there [the 136-acre Shade Farm between Burnside Bridge and Branch Avenue] is looking better every day. A cooperative effort in November with SHAF and the NPS made. You directly have helped CWPT to save more than 21,000 acres of hallowed ground. I hope you are as proud of that fact as I am....(O)n behalf of the Board of Trustees and the staff, I thank you humbly for your overwhelming support. No two ways about it: You are the reason for our success.” (Note: A restricted donation of an additional $500 from an anonymous benefactor was added to the $500 voted by the Battlefield Preservation Fund committee to allow us to renew our CWPT membership at the $1,000—or “Color Bearer”–level.)

Finally, we also received a letter of thanks for our donation of $300 from the Friends of Raymond (FOR), whose organization supports “preservation, management, and promotion of significant historical areas of Raymond [Mississippi].” Treasurer David McCain concluded as follows: “As highways and urban development continue their growth, more sites become threatened and pieces of history are lost. Timely action to preserve the past is essential. Your contributions and your interest are vital to the FOR in these preservation and interpretation efforts.” Our September 2004 speaker, Parker Hills, is vice president of the Friends of Raymond; members of the CWRT and other battlefield tour attendees will have the opportunity to view the work of the FOR when they visit Raymond during the upcoming Vicksburg tour.

NPS Journal Provides Insights into Early History of Civil War Battlefield Preservation: Richard W. Sellars, an NPS historian working in Santa Fe, New Mexico, offers a fascinating and incisive summary of initial efforts to save Civil War battlefields in his recent article “Pilgrim Places: Civil War Battlefields, Historic Preservation, and America’s First National Military Parks, 1863-1900.” Appearing in the Winter 2005 issue of the biannual CRM: The Journal of Heritage Stewardship (a publication of the National Park Service), this piece focuses on the five Civil War preserves that constitute the foundation and nucleus of our national battlefield park network: Chickamauga/Chattanooga, Antietam, Shiloh, Gettysburg, and Vicksburg. Dr. Sellars is a long-time student of the Park Service’s drive to preserve and maintain both the natural and cultural resources for which it is responsible; this piece is adapted from his current project, a book on preserving history in the national parks. Those wishing to read his fine work can acquire a free subscription to CRM Journal in one of three ways: online at www.cr.nps.gov/CRMJournal; by e-mail at NPS_CRMJournal@nps.gov; or DrMJMAbroe@cs.com.

Recipients of Donations from CWRT Preservation Fund Send Thanks: At its February meeting, the Battlefield Preservation Fund Committee voted to give $500 each to the Wilson’s Creek National Battlefield Foundation and Save Historic Antietam Foundation (SHAF), the latter gift in support of SHAF’s current effort to help the National Park Service at Antietam place historically accurate split-rail fencing along Branch Avenue at the south end of the field. At the same time, the committee also voted $500 to renew the membership of the Civil War Round Table in the Civil War Preservation Trust (CWPT). Recently we received acknowledgments in the form of letters from Ron Elkins, Jr., president of the Wilson’s Creek group; Tom Clemens, president of SHAF; and Jim Lighthizer, president of CWPT.

On March 11th Bruce S. Allardice gave an informative and interesting speech entitled “The Vote to Win the War: The Election of 1864” before 91 members and guests at the 639th regular meeting of the Civil War Round Table of Chicago. A past president of this organization, Bruce is the author of More Generals in Gray (LSU Press, 1995) and has written several articles for Civil War magazines. A very popular speaker for Civil War Round Tables, he is currently a history teacher. In his presentation, he claimed that the only legitimate chance for a Confederate victory was a Lincoln defeat in the 1864 presidential election.

Allardice began by insisting “the South never had a chance to win a military victory in the Civil War, that the decisive battle was Fort Sumter [April 12-13, 1861] because once the war began, the South had no chance of winning!” After stating several cogent arguments highlighting the South’s great disadvantages, the next thesis explored the possibility that a political event, such as the 1864 election, could have allowed the Confederates to maintain a separate government. The 1864 election, pitting an ant iw ar Democratic Party against a prewar Republican president, was the one such occasion to determine war and peace.

On August 23, 1864, President Lincoln presented a note to his cabinet, asking for their signatures. The note was an admission that Lincoln felt that a real possibility existed that the Republican Party, and Lincoln, could lose the upcoming election. Lincoln was concerned that Democrats had made huge gains in several northern states in the 1862 elections. Lincoln thought that perhaps northern society rejected his prewar party.

Some startling facts concerning voting patterns of the 1860s emerged during the presentation. For example, few states in the 1860s allowed soldiers (or anybody else) to vote by absentee ballot. In 1860 only one state, Pennsylvania, allowed for absentee voting. Since few Americans in this era traveled, absentee balloting was not a major priority. Despite the practical question of who would supervise the collection of absentee ballots, by 1864 most northern states had altered their laws to permit absentee ballots so that U.S. soldiers on the battlefields could vote.

The Democratic Party had controlled U.S. politics for most of the 40 years prior to Lincoln’s election in 1860. The Democrats felt a sense of entitlement toward the federal government and its policy, feeling that they, not the upstart Republicans, were the natural party of government. Their opposition to Lincoln was marked with mudslinging and extreme name-calling. Among other epithets, Lincoln was called “a baboon”, “buffoon”, “a radical fanatic”, and “ignoramus Abe”.

The 1864 Democratic candidate, selected in Chicago, was General George McClellan, erstwhile commander of the Army of the Potomac. President Lincoln had relieved him of command in 1862, following the battle of Antietam (September 17, 1862) when Lincoln claimed McClellan had made a case of the “slow”. McClellan, a “War” Democrat, supported the war but opposed the Emancipation Proclamation. He wished to return to the U.S. of 1860, with no agitation over slavery, with the peaceful readmittance of southern states to the Union. The Democrats were divided between “Peace” Democrats who opposed the war, and “War” Democrats like McClellan. Many “Peace” Democrats thought a “War” Democrat like McClellan was hardly preferable to a Republican.

At this time “many Republicans viewed Abraham Lincoln as an anchor that threatened to drag the party and war effort down,” explained Allardice. Radical Republicans like abolitionist Wendell Phillips charged that the administration’s handling of the war was “a civil and military failure”. Extreme Radical gathered in Cleveland in 1864 to nominate John C. Fremont on a radical abolitionist platform. Other Republicans desired to replace Lincoln with a stronger candidate, General Ulysses S. Grant, the war hero. Grant declined any discussion of his candidacy for president.

In June, 1864, in Baltimore, President Lincoln was unanimously renominated as the “Union” Party candidate. A southern “War” Democrat, Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, was nominated as Lincoln’s running mate. The Union Party platform called for the unconditional prosecution of the war, and for a constitutional amendment to abolish slavery in the U.S.

In late August, 1864, the Democrats met in Chicago for their convention. The “Peace” Democrats passed the controversial “War Failure” plank, which claimed that the Lincoln administration had failed to restore the Union by “the experiment of war”. General McClellan, nominated for president, had “Gentleman George” Pendleton as his running mate. At this convention the Democrats paired a prowar presidential nominee with an ant iwar vice presidential nominee and an ant iwar platform. After some delay, McClellan accepted the nomination, but under his terms—that the war would still be fought. The ant iwar Democrat platform induced Fremont to drop out of the race, consolidating Lincoln’s prowar support.

The Confederates were as disappointed with the McClellan nomination as the “Peace” Democrats. It was clear that the war would be prosecuted, no matter who was elected.

Lincoln was reelected that November with a sizable majority. Lincoln received 2.2 million (55%) of the four million votes cast. McClellan carried only three states—New Jersey, Delaware and Kentucky. The Electoral College vote was 212 for Lincoln,. 21 for McClellan. Lincoln received 78% of the soldier’s vote.

Allardice concluded by postulating that no possible election result would have changed the outcome of the war. Even if a “Peace” Democrat had been elected, Lincoln’s administration would have been in power until March 4, 1865. By then the war was clearly a Union victory. “By March, 1865, there was literally no Confederacy left to bargain with, and slavery’s death was an accomplished fact”.
