813th REGULAR MEETING, Friday, November 11th, 2022

The Nevins-Freeman Address:
Mary Abroe on
“Historic Preservation and Civil War Battlefields: An American Story”

Live/Zoom Meeting. Time: Nov. 11th, 2022, 07:30 PM CST.
NOTE: The November meeting will be held at the Holiday Inn Oak Brook, 17W 350 22nd St., Oakbrook Terrace.

Zoom Option ID 845 3227 1496; No Passcode needed

Founded by Congress in August 1890, Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park is our first federal battlefield park. Later that same month, passage of legislation that set aside funding for preserving battle lines and buying land to mark troop positions provided the basis for what became Antietam National Battlefield Site. Rounding out the five "granddaddies" that constitute the nucleus of our national battlefield park network are Shiloh (1894), Gettysburg (1895), and Vicksburg (1899). At a time when there was no National Park Service as we know it and only a few other "national parks"--like Yellowstone and Yosemite, both of which were western wilderness parks--the Civil War preserves of the 1890s set the precedent for all national historical parks (of whatever designation) going forward. As a result, those turn-of-the-century military establishments are among the premier historical properties of the entire National Park System.

Additional Civil War sites joined their predecessors over the next 120-plus years, but whether we consider Chickamauga or Mill Springs (KY)--in 2020 the most recent addition to the System--the immediate thought for many, if not most, is "killing fields." And so they were. But, over time, as men and women lived, worked, and remembered on those grounds, layers of human motives and actions also shaped them. In that way, preserved battlefields have plenty to reveal about Americans' understanding of the Civil War and their resulting urge to preserve its sites as memorials, patriotic symbols, tourist destinations, documentary evidence, and outdoor classrooms. The battlefields also are full of stories about local communities, whose people, through no choice of their own, became witnesses to history and neighbors of the places where it happened.

This presentation focuses on what modern Civil War parks tell us about their meaning and preservation at the hands of successive generations of Americans, ourselves included--those who, over the decades between the 1890s and the early twenty-first century, have continued to shape those landscapes.

Mary Abroe holds a BA in history from St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana and a PhD from Loyola University Chicago. She is retired from teaching at the College of Lake County in Grayslake, Illinois. Dr. Abroe is vice chair of the Board of Trustees of the American Battlefield Trust and a director of the Save Historic Antietam Foundation. She also is past president of the Civil War Round Table of Chicago.

Battlefield Preservation

Hi:

I guess you could say that music is on the brain … because we are the (preservation) champions, my friend. Your support provided the push we needed to secure 498 acres at the Champion Hill Battlefield in Hinds County, Miss. This acquisition acreage, which includes 144 acres we previously protected with a conservation easement and now own outright, brings our total saved land at this Magnolia State site to over 1,200 acres! And looking from an eagle’s eye perspective, this means we have saved approximately 2,091 acres associated with the Vicksburg Campaign. …

Family Legacy
During the Battle of Champion Hill, the fighting unfolded on land owned by Sid and Matilda Champion. Still located in the area, the Champion family agreed to sell their entire holdings after building a multi-year relationship with the Trust. These 498 acres, critical to understanding the Vicksburg Campaign, would’ve never been acquired had it not been for the Champion family’s dedication to battlefield preservation.

The Difference You’ve Made

Ever since the Vicksburg National Military Park boundary was expanded to include the Champion Hill Battlefield, the Trust and the National Park Service have had their sights set on acquiring ownership of this very land so that the public may one day step foot upon it. Boosting support granted by the American Battlefield Protection Program, State of Mississippi and the HTR Foundation, YOU brought this 498-acre project across the finish line.

I hope you know that you are OUR key to battlefield preservation — like Vicksburg was the key to controlling the Mississippi river.

David Duncan, President, American Battlefield Trust

October Meeting

By Mark Matranga

Bruce Allardice gave a most interesting and informative presentation at the 812th Regular Meeting of The Civil War Round Table on October 14, 2022, on “The Mysteries of the Hunley.” Allardice offered a splendid display of art, graphic designs and artifacts from the submarine as well as updated information on the salvage and restoration efforts on this unique piece of our Civil War heritage. He also delved into the numerous theories of what caused the demise of the Hunley after its first – and last – wartime engagement.

Allardice noted that the idea of a submersible machine was not new at the time of the Civil War. There is a depiction dated 331 BC of Alexander the Great being lowered in a Glass submersible. During the Revolutionary War, Thomas Bushnell built the Turtle, an unsuccessful one-man device; Robert Fulton created the submarine Nautilus, for Napoleon Bonaparte. The Union Navy developed the USS Alligator at the time of the Civil War but abandoned the idea when the navy decided there weren’t enough Confederate ships to warrant using submarines.
The prototype for the Hunley was developed by James McClintock, who designed his Pioneer as a privateer and tested his ship on Lake Pontchartrain. Horace L. Hunley came on board as financier and when New Orleans was captured the project moved to Mobile Bay where the Hunley was designed and built. Originally, batteries were proposed for propulsion, but these were not powerful enough to move the ship against the tides, so the decision was made to use manpower. Meanwhile, General Beauregard got wind of McClintock and Hunley’s work, whereupon the ship was transported by rail to Charleston in August 1863. Upon arrival and its maiden voyage there, the Hunley immediately sunk with five crewmen all lost, apparently capsized by the wake of a passing ship.

At this point, Hunley assumed the helm, but he too met with disaster. On his attempt to submerge the ship on October 15, 1863, he dove at too extreme an angle and lost his life and his crew’s; the Hunley was stuck in deep mud in the harbor. Command passed to Lt. George E. Dixon, who was shot in the leg at Shiloh but saved by a $20 gold piece he held in his breast pocket. Dixon led his crew of seven men and sortied out to sea from an inlet on Sullivan’s Island the night of February 19, 1864, to confront the United States naval blockade.

The Hunley was a small craft, some 40 feet (12 meters) long whose hull was a mere 4.25 feet high. But as Allardice pointed out, its design was more sophisticated than one would have thought. The hull was sleek, with countersunk rivets. She was designed for a crew of eight, seven to turn the hand-crank propeller and one to steer. The benches on which the crew sat angled downward for better leverage while pumping. It featured a highly efficient gear train and flywheel. There were two ballast tanks that could be flooded by valves and pumped dry with hand pumps. There were two watertight hatches for but these were rather narrow – 16.5 inches wide. A copper cylinder containing 135 pounds of black powder was attached to a 22 feet long hinged spar that extended at a downward angle from the bow; this ‘spar torpedo’ was in turn supported by a line that extended down from a bow pole which extended straight out from the ship. The torpedo was fitted with a contact fuse designed to explode on contact with an enemy vessel.

The Hunley made way for the 1,260-ton sloop USS Housatonic anchored off Charleston harbor. Although detected at the last moment, the Hunley’s torpedo was successfully placed below the waterline near the stern on the starboard side of the Housatonic. The contact fuse worked as designed; the Housatonic went down in five minutes. As soon as the torpedo detonated, Lt. Dixon signaled that she had completed her mission and was returning to shore. A fire was lit to guide the Hunley back to land, but she disappeared. What happened to the Hunley?
Theories abound but none have been officially accepted. That the explosion caused leaks in the hull, that the Hunley was rammed by another ship, or that the seacocks or snorkel box were somehow damaged are all unlikely causes as it appears water entered the ship only after the crew was dead. Allardice theorizes that the crew may have miscalculated, trying to stay on the harbor side of the Housatonic but could not overcome the force of the receding tide and, exhausted, simply ran out of oxygen. He regards the current theory that the crew was killed by the concussive force of the blast with some skepticism. He argues that the blast would have travelled upward and not out toward the Hunley.

When the Hunley was finally found, 131 years after it sunk, it was located, oddly, on the ocean side of the Housatonic in 30 feet of water. The Hunley performed well – the first successful combat submarine - but was undone. By the forces of physics perhaps, or maybe just the limits of human endurance. Either way, Bruce Allardice offers a fresh view to an old story and reminds us that the Hunley, probably the most tangible physical artifact from our Civil War, no longer resides under the sea.

BULLETIN BOARD

The Kenosha Civil War Museum is putting on the following in-person/virtual programs:

Friday, November 11, noon. “The Civil War Nursing Service of Sister Anthony O’Connell and the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati,” Presented by Judith Metz

Sister Anthony O’Connell (1814-1897), a Sister of Charity, ministered in Cincinnati, Ohio, for sixty years. Typical of thousands of nineteenth century Irish Catholic immigrant women, she entered a religious community when she was barely out of her teens and spent her life serving in Catholic sponsored ministries. She distinguished herself by her intelligence, leadership and uncommon virtue. Her work in the hospitals of Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky as a U.S. Army nurse during the Civil War brought her fame and the undying admiration of the soldiers she treated.
For more on programs at the museum, visit https://museums.kenosha.org/civilwar/events/

Rob Girardi will present “The Murder of Major General William Nelson” Dec. 1st at the Cobb County (GA) CWRT.

Ed Bearss Book award: Nominations Sought. This Chicago CWRT award is for a new book or body of work of recent vintage that breaks new ground in our study of the Civil War.

The committee is seeking nominations that meet these criteria from the general membership. The committee consists of Rob Girardi as chairman, Mark Matranga, and Kurt Carlson. Several books have been put forth but we are seeking additional nominees prior to making a determination.

Special Meeting Giveaway

The CWRT will be giving away a free Civil War book or item to anyone attending the November meeting in person. A bonus for attending. And a way of saying thank you to our members.

The Annual Nevins - Freeman Award

In 1974, The Civil War Round Table of Chicago established the Nevins-Freeman Award, and bestows it annually on an individual whose advancement of American Civil War scholarship and support for the Round Table movement warrant special recognition. The award itself is designed as a generous financial donation to a historical preservation project chosen by the recipient.

This award is named for two historians whose legacies have come to be synonymous with the Civil War era: multi-Pulitzer Prize winners Allan Nevins and Douglas Southall Freeman.

The list of distinguished winners is below:

1974: Bruce Catton
1975: Ralph G. Newman
1976: T. Harry Williams
1977: Lloyd D. Miller
1978: Bell I. Wiley
1979: E.B. (Pete) Long
1980: Edwin C. Bearss
1981: James I. (Bud) Robertson, Jr.
1982: Frank E. Vandiver
1983: John Hope Franklin
1984: Richard B. Harwell
1985: John Y. Simon
1986: Harold M. Hyman
1987: James T. Hickey
1988: Robert K. Krice
1989: Mark E. Neely, Jr.
1990: Marshall D. Krack
1991: Gary Gallagher
1992: Shelby Foote
1993: Stephen B. Oates
1994: Alan T. Nolan
1995: Richard Nelson Current
1996: James M. McPherson
1997: Wiley Sword
1998: William C. (Jack) Davis
1999: David Herbert Donald
2000: Charles P. Roland
